WOMEN’S CITIZENSHIP IN PERU
Women’s Citizenship in Peru
The Paradoxes of Neopopulism in Latin America

Stéphanie Rousseau
To Simone and Flore, my grandmothers
This page intentionally left blank
Contents

Acknowledgments ............................................................... ix
Introduction ................................................................. 1

1 Neopopulism and Women’s Citizenship in Latin America .................. 11

2 Fujimori’s Peru: State and Society ........................................ 35

3 Feminist Activism: Engendering State Policy through NGO Work ........... 67

4 Women Organizing in Shantytowns: State Co-optation and the Exhaustion of Solidarity .................................................. 97

5 Entering the Mainstream Political Sphere: Women as Elected Representatives ................................................................. 129

Conclusion: The Paradoxes of Constructing Women’s Citizenship under Neopopulism .................................................. 157

Appendix: List of Interviews .................................................. 179
Notes .................................................................................. 183
References ......................................................................... 195
Index ................................................................................ 217
This page intentionally left blank
Acknowledgments

While the work involved in writing a book can be quite solitary at times, the contribution of many individuals to this enterprise not only enriched the quality of the research but also made the whole experience much more pleasant and stimulating. This project started as a PhD dissertation and grew more mature as I was turning it into a book. I want to express my wholehearted gratitude to Philip Oxhorn who acted as a superb advisor for my dissertation. Phil provided constant support, encouragement, and fine intellectual guidance. His high spirits and our shared interest for Latin America made the arduous tasks involved in the different steps of the research project not only more worthwhile but also gratifying. Elisabeth Friedman generously accepted to be the external evaluator of my dissertation and encouraged me to reflect critically upon several issues to write this book. I also want to thank the anonymous reviewers for their criticisms and suggestions, without which the final product would be much different. Also crucial was Cynthia Kelly’s editing work.

My learning process of Peruvian politics included spending over a year in the country at a particularly difficult but interesting moment of its history: the last months of the Fujimori government and the beginning of what Peruvians were calling the “transition to democracy.” Cecilia Blondet opened me the doors of the Instituto de Estudios Peruanos (IEP) where I spent six months as a visiting fellow, and commented on several drafts of this book. Martín Tanaka also shared his thoughts and provided feedback. The IEP was a great research environment due to the high quality and friendliness of its staff and research associates.

Of course, the many women working in the women’s movement organizations that I interviewed for the purpose of this book, or with whom I had many informal conversations, were also a great source of inspiration. I want to thank those who made a special effort to assist me in carrying out my research project: Rosario Bustamante, Patricia Carrillo, Gloria Cubas, Cecilia Olea, Roxana Vásquez, and Ana-María Yañez.

Many other individuals helped me, willingly or without knowing it, in the discovery of Peru’s multiple layers of complexity. I want to thank all these people, and in particular Erika Bocanegra, Jorge Valladares, Stephanie Boyd, Omar Pereyra, Nosa Luna, Sofía Macher, Rafael Roncagliolo, Guillermo Salas, Cynthia Sanborn, Pancho Soberón, and Julio Villanueva Chang.

Financial resources are always an essential component of academic research, and due acknowledgment is made of the following agencies’ support: Fonds Concerté d’Aide à la Recherche du Québec (FCAR, now FQRSC), Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, McGill University’s Faculty of Graduate Studies and Research, and McGill University Centre for Research and Teaching on Women. Since I started as Assistant Professor at the Department of Sociology of Université Laval, the Faculty of Social Sciences has provided me valuable research grants, some of which facilitated the completion of this book.

Finally, I want to thank Marie-Diane, Louis, and Elisabeth for making me who I am and Rémi for his love and support.