This book is the product of three years of doctoral research at the London Consortium supported by a grant from the Arts and Humanities Research Council, without which it would not have been possible and for which I am most grateful. I would like to give particular thanks to my supervisor Colin MacCabe for his frank and always excellent advice and his incisive reading of numerous drafts. Marina Lathouri – who acted as secondary supervisor – also had a significant input, helping me to improve the parts of the book that deal with architecture and urban planning. Sections of this thesis were presented at London Consortium PhD seminars led by Barry Curtis, Aura Satz and Patrick Wright: their comments and suggestions – and those of Consortium students – were of great help as I refined my ideas. Steven Connor has inspired, advised and assisted me at crucial points during the writing of this book. David Trotter and Morag Shiach examined the doctoral thesis upon which this book is based and I am very grateful for their insights which were of much use as I revised the manuscript. I would also like to thank Peter Taunton who commented insightfully on a full draft (twice) and Lucy Scholes who proofread certain sections. Gloria Martin and Kate Taunton were hugely supportive. Finally, special thanks go to Doris Pearce, who made it all fun.
